But as in case of enemy attack it was the district's duty to help out the attached battalion and ~~di~~ units it was inadvisable to establish the district seat too close to the border so to run the risk of capture or being cut off from its battalion resp. units. So the district seats were chosen with great care at those locations where an attack was to be expected according to the communist ideology. The development of the Background in Hungary was started in 1948 simultaneously with the accession to power of the communist regime and with the expulsion of Yugoslavia from the Soviet Block. At that time the Hungarian-Yugoslav border being the most important one the first district seats were established in the South. Immediately afterwards construction was continued along the Austro-Hungarian frontier.

These buildings (district seat buildings) were planned and constructed after soviet plans and experiences. (There was only minimal difference ~~among~~ to those ~~district~~ district seat buildings erected after '48)
